JOB MARKET PAPER

“Time to Shop Until Inflation Drops: The Effect of Inflation on Household Shopping Effort”

Abstract: I study how households adapt their shopping behavior in response to inflation. Using transaction-level purchase data, I quantify how inflation increased shopping intensity and bargain-hunting behavior from 2020 to 2023. My results show that a 1 percentage-point increase in household-level inflation caused households to undertake, on average, 2.3 additional shopping trips per month and to visit 0.7 more distinct retailers. Within trips, the share of items households bought with coupons, on sale, and as store brands rose by 0.26, 0.24, and 0.35 percentage points. These behaviors entail real resource costs, with time-use evidence implying roughly 1.7 extra hours of shopping per month per 1pp of inflation.
